Talking Points in Opposition to a 200-mile Fisheries Bill

File

The Executive Branch strongly opposes the passage of bills that would unilaterally establish a 200-mile fisheries zone off the U.S. coast. The multilateral and bilateral treaty approach is a better means for solving the overfishing problem for the following reasons:

- U.S. security interests require naval mobility for our general purpose and strategic deterrent forces in the 40% of the world's oceans covered by 200-mile zones. Historically unilateral extensions of fisheries jurisdiction have led to territorial claims where submerged transit and freedom of overflight are prohibited. U.S. security interests in the 200-mile economic zone and in international straits will be much better safeguarded in a Law of the Sea Treaty.
- Existing U.S. agreements on both the high seas and fisheries would be undermined by unilateral legislation. Customary law freedom of navigation and overflight beyond the territorial sea is codified in the 1958 Geneva Convention on the High Seas. The U.S. is also party to agreements managing fisheries through eight international commissions and twelve bilateral treaties. Our agreements on distant water tuna and shrimp fishing as well as the recent bilateral treaties with the Soviet Union and Japan providing for substantial reduction in their catch would be seriously damaged.
- Enforcement of a 200-mile statute against non-consenting nations such as the Soviet Union, Japan and the United Kingdom raises the spectre of major confrontations on the high seas. Enforcement against non-consenting nations in a 200-mile zone (an area over 90% the size of the U.S. land territory) would be financially costly and would invite retaliation not necessarily limited to fisheries matters.

-- Secretary Kissinger views unilateral legislation as a last resort and the U.S. is resolved to help conclude the Law of the Sea Conference in 1976. In the meantime, the Secretary has said: "To conserve the fish and protect our fishing industry while the Treaty is being negotiated, the United States will negotiate interim arrangements with other nations to conserve the fish stocks, to ensure effective enforcement, and to protect the livelihood of our coastal fishermen. These agreements will be a transition to the eventual 200-mile zone."

Neither our coastal fisheries nor this bill is a partisan issue. We are all concerned about the destruction of a resource essential to our people and share a determination to see that it is stopped. I do hope, however, that you will support the President in his judgment that this bill is not the proper course, and enable the Administration to take the alternative actions that they have proposed. I urge you to vote no on H.R. 200.

Sincerely,
