On other pending matters, we would be pleased to resume them after our election.

President: That is not much longer. We consider our friendship important to us and the free world. We want to do everything possible to maximize our relationship.

President: What is your reaction to this UN session?

Malik: I think it more moderate -- on very controversial matters. Korea was luckily pushed aside. Also Africa, thanks to Secretary Kissinger. We feel the general situation is better than previously.

President: That is our impression. There is much work to be done but it is best done in a constructive atmosphere.

Malik: There are some new countries which want to make a fuss, but nothing important.

President: It is strange to realize that a country the size of Indonesia has one vote and one with 50,000 people also has one vote.

Malik: I think there needs to be a process of education in the UN, so there is also a sense of responsibility. There is Lebanon, which is delicate, but there is no unity among the Arabs, so not much chance for solution.

President: We are anxious for Lebanon to be settled. We want to preserve its independence and integrity. It is a terrible tragedy but we think it is moving slowly to get better.

Malik: I think it is important for us all to do what we can, but the parties in the area are crucial.

President: It was very nice to see you. Please give my very best regards to President Suharto.
