THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

I am happy to send my greetings to the young people across our country who take part in Model United Nations Assemblies.

The United States was the chief architect of the United Nations more than three decades ago. We were convinced that after the terrible calamity of world war, a new basis for global cooperation had to be established.

The world has changed dramatically since 1945. New challenges have arisen. Almost one hundred new nations have become United Nations members. The task of building a just and stable world order is now even more complex as the destinies of all nations and peoples have become increasingly intertwined.

Yet despite changing times, United States support of the UN remains strong and determined. And your participation in this Model United Nations Assembly reflects our untiring commitment to help shape a better world for ourselves and succeeding generations.

I commend you for beginning so early in your lives to express interest in global affairs. And I salute your enthusiasm to learn all that you can along avenues of peace, humanitarian action and international cooperation and goodwill.
